The admissions form becomes a way to connect school reform with the students entering higher education. The film examines school stages, foundational learning, subject choice, entrance tests and teacher preparation. It then asks when these changes could actually reach a first-year classroom. A policy aspiration is a starting question, not evidence that every incoming student has acquired the same preparation.

Students arrive from different boards, languages and implementation timelines, with different opportunities to learn. It reorganises curricular and pedagogical stages across ages three to eighteen; it does not by itself require new school buildings. A target describes an intended outcome; surveys and classroom work provide different kinds of evidence about what students can do.

A short task without marks reveals prior understanding and helps the teacher plan support without publicly ranking students. An integrated teacher-education programme combines education with disciplinary study, so subject faculty may help prepare future school teachers.

In practice: Set one low-stakes entry task and ask about students' prior board and medium of instruction. Use the findings to plan a short bridge.
